If your father had a will that named you to inherit something, his executor (the person charged with rounding up his property and distributing it) should have contacted you when the will was probated -- generally a month or two after death. Anyone who has possession of a will is required, by law, to produce it after the will-writer has died.

Not everyone can contest a will. A lawsuit brought to challenge the validity of a last will and testament can only be filed by certain people who would be personally and financially affected by the will's terms if it were to be accepted by the court as it is. In legal terms, these people are said to have "standing."
